For years I've photographed city streets, collecting colours, urban vegetation, spray-painted utility markings and the improvised geometries that form a lexicon of what lies beneath our feet—the hidden infrastructure that keeps the city running.

In the studio, observation gives way to abstraction. Working with painted paper, I draw with a blade, cutting, extracting and reassembling forms that shift, collide and find balance through colour, rhythm and scale.

While rooted in the visual language of the street, the work moves beyond description. They are less about specific places than the experience of noticing, where movement, light and unexpected beauty emerge from the overlooked fragments of everyday life.
